YOU CAN'T BEAT THE DUTCH

Preparation of Rabbit Skins

CURING:

Hang the skins up to dry where they will be protected from sun, flies, and mice. The following day examine them to see if the edges are drying flat and that the skin on the front legs is straightened out. Remove any patches of fat as it will cause the skin to burn and lower the value of the pelt. During periods of low temperatures some artificial heat will be required to dry out the skins. This is accomplished in large slaughtering plants by circulating air in the drying room.

TANNING SKINS FOR HOME USE:

Skins that are to be sold should not be tanned before shipment, for the fur buyers prefer them in the raw state. If intended for home use, however, they may be tanned by the methods described below. They should not be expected to compare favorably in appearance and pliability with products of a tannery or factory equipped with modern machinery and operated by experienced workmen.

The first step in tanning is to get the skin thoroughly softened, clean and free from flesh or grease. If it is cased or whole, slit the skin down the middle of the belly and soak it in clean, cool water. Change the water several times. When the skin is soft, lay it over a pole or board and work over the skin side with a coarse file or dull knife, breaking up and removing the adhering tissue, flesh and fat and at the same time working the grease and oil out of the skin. It is useless to start tanning until all the tissue, fat and grease have been removed and the skin has been made uniformly soft and pliable.

The thickness and condition of the pelt determine the length of time a skin must be soaked. Some skins require two or three hours and others longer. A skin must be soaked until soft, but it should not remain wet longer than necessary as the hair may start to slip. When it has been thus treated and is somewhat softened, it should be worked in lukewarm water containing an ounce of soda or borax to the gallon. Soap added to the water is also helpful in cutting the grease and softening and cleansing the skin. After it has been rinsed thoroughly in lukewarm water the water should be squeezed out but the pelt should not be wrung. Finally the skin should be worked in gasoline, which should remove the last particles of dirt and grease. It is then ready for tanning.

There are several methods for tanning rabbit skins. Directions for using two of the more successful methods, the salt-acid and the salt-alum processes.

THE SALT ALUM METHOD:

The salt alum formulae calls for one pound of ammonia alum (ammonium aluminum sulfate) or potash alum (potassium aluminum sulfate) dissolved in one gallon of water; and four ounces washing soda (crystallized sodium carbonate) and eight ounces common salt dissolved together in $\frac{1}{2}$ gallon of water. Pour the soda-salt solution slowly into the alum solution while stirring vigorously. Mix the combined solution as used with sufficient flour to make a thin paste, first mixing the flour with a little water to prevent lumps.

The skin, cleaned and softened as previously described, should be tacked out smoothly, flesh side up, on a board and then coated about an eighth of an inch thick with the tanning paste and protected with paper or sacking laid on lightly so as not to come in close contact with the paste. At intervals of a day repeat the application two or three times, depending on the thickness of the skin. Only thick skins from mature bucks will need as many as three applications. Leave the last coating on for three or four days, finally, scrape off the paste, work the skin in borax water, rinse and squeeze it, and then stretch and work it over board in the manner described for the salt acid process.

The salt-alum is widely used and is considered better than the salt-acid tanning, although alum tanned skins often come out stiff and hard and require much working to make them soft and pliable.

SALT-ACID PROCESS

The salt-acid formula calls for a solution made of one pound of common salt and one-half ounce of concentrated sulfuric acid to each gallon of water. Dissolve the salt in the water and carefully pour in the acid while stirring. This tanning liquor should be made and used in glass or earthen jars or wooden vessels, never in metal containers of any kind. When pouring in the acid do not inhale the fumes given off. Be careful also not to get any of the strong acid on the skin or clothing. As soon as the salt-acid solution has cooled, it is ready for use.

Put the cleaned, softened skin in the solution so that it is entirely covered. After one to three days, during which it has been stirred frequently, remove it and rinse in clean, cool water. The skin should then be worked for about ten minutes in a solution of one ounce of borax to one gallon of water. Rinse again in clean water and squeeze (but do not wring) as dry as possible. Work the skin a few minutes in the hands by rubbing and pulling, then tack it out flat, flesh side up and apply a thin coating of grease or oil and let it dry. Fresh butter, goats-foot oil or olive oil are good for this purpose.

When the pelt is nearly dry but still damp, begin to work it with the hands, stretching it in all directions and working the flesh side over the edge of a board and pulling it back and forth as if shining shoes with a cloth. If the skin is rough it may be smoothed by working it over a sandpaper block, which also helps to make it soft and pliable. Skin depends upon this repeated working, which must be done while the skin is drying out and not after it is dry. If the skin is not soft enough when dry, it should be dampened and worked again as before. If still greasy it may be given a hasty bath in gasoline. A final cleaning, accomplished by working the skin in warm, dry, hardwood sawdust, is beneficial and will add to the luster of the fur.
